The Low-Capacity Semester

Study planning when your energy is variable.

A PLANNER FOR STUDENTS WHO DON’T RUN AT ONE SPEED

01 The condition

Most planners assume the same student shows up every day. Some weeks you are the one who reads three chapters before lunch. Some weeks, opening the course portal is the whole achievement.

Planning for your best week guarantees falling behind on the others, and then the planner itself turns into evidence against you: another thing you didn’t keep up with.

This planner works from the floor up. Each week starts with the least that has to happen for the course to keep moving. Anything beyond that is extra, not owed.

02 How to use this sample

On Sunday, or whenever your week begins, fill in one row per course. Write the floor first. Only then decide whether there is room for more.

The floor rule: if only the floor gets done, the week counts.

03 The bare-minimum week

Week of _____

COURSE	THE FLOOR (MUST DO)	IF THERE'S MORE	DUE

If the floor isn't possible this week, who do I tell, and by when?

What made last week heavier than it needed to be?

THE FULL PLANNER

This is a two-page sample of The Low-Capacity Semester, a 17-page planner. The full version also holds:

— Bare-minimum templates for weekly and term planning
— Tracking without guilt, and a restart page for abandoned weeks
— Contact templates for professors when the floor slips
