Writing in Two Voices

Using AI as a draft partner without writing yourself out.

A GUIDE FOR WRITERS WHO USE AI AND STAY IN THE WRITING

01 The condition

Writing that has passed through AI and not been rewritten has a texture: even, reasonable, faintly familiar. Readers rarely name it. They just stop leaning in.

There is a way of using these tools that leaves the writer in the writing, and a way that doesn't. The difference is less about how much you use them than about where. Scaffolding, alternatives and questions help. Final sentences, in bulk, tend not to.

02 How to use this sample

Take a finished piece you drafted with help. Read it once with the checklist on the next page beside you, and tick what you find. Then rewrite only the passages the ticks point to, by hand.

03 The flatness test

- ☐ Three adjectives in a row, anywhere
- ☐ Paragraphs that end on a tidy summary line
- ☐ Sentences that could sit unchanged in anyone else’s piece
- ☐ The same “not this, but that” turn used more than once
- ☐ No detail that only you would know
- ☐ A closing line that tells the reader what to feel

Two or more ticks: rewrite those passages yourself before publishing.

WHERE IT HELPS

— Outlining and reordering
— Offering three alternatives to a stuck line
— Interviewing you for what you actually think

WHERE IT CORRODES

— Voice drift across a long piece
— Averaging sharp opinions into mild ones
— Detail replaced by plausible generality
